

GDP Slows Down

Friday, 19 February 2010

Earlier, economic forecasters have predicted an amicable growth for the United States. Generally, these forecasters have already been prematurely shot down, whereby the latest figures released by the Federal Reserve suggested that the growth for the country is indeed slowing down considerably – yet again.

Basically, forecasters predicted that the GDP rate for the country might stand in the region of 2.6 percent for Q1 2010. Surely, the figures recorded by the Feds, showed that the economy grew in less than half of the forecasted figures.

Do you think that the US economy will continue to grow in the near future?
